18th Annual Symposium
Emergencies in Medical Practice

The practice of clinical medicine is usually one of careful and unhurried contemplation. However, frequently the physician has to think and act with great speed. The 1986 Granada Hills Community Hospital program deals with emergencies in medical practice, situations in which the physician may have to act with quick dispatch. This program has general appeal, and runs the spectrum from sophisticated procedures such as emergency cardiac surgery, through the impact of the trauma center on patient care.

After attending the program, participants should be able to:

- Describe indications for, techniques of, and outcomes in emergency revascularization of the heart, and be proficient with the state of the art of PTCA.
- Diagnose and treat such diverse medical emergencies as TIAs, snake, arthropod, and marine mammal bites, acute asthma, and acute gastrointestinal hemorrhage.
- Recognize and treat all types of shock. Initiate appropriate resuscitation for the victim of near drowning and upper airway obstructive disorders.
- Appropriately manage the emergency medical care of endocrinologic disease, problems in oncology, and drug interactions frequently seen in office practice.
- Enumerate the causes of acute pelvic pain in the female patient, and the emergency treatment of acute vaginal bleeding.
